

List of Available Kitchens and Resources

Dear Entrepreneur,

Incubator kitchens, which are food facilities that have multiple users, can be a good resource for small food business startups. The overhead costs of using an incubator kitchen can be much lower than renovating, building, or renting a facility. Many incubator kitchens also have commercial equipment that might be cost prohibitive for a small startup. For “cottage food” (foods made at home for sale directly to the end consumer) businesses, the incubator kitchen provides a separation from personal use kitchens.

Incubator Kitchen locations across Kansas.

There are some food safety concerns to consider when using an incubator kitchen. In Kansas, each individual operation that is required to be licensed must have its own license in the incubator kitchen. For example, a license is required if a processor is making a product that requires temperature control for safety or is distributing the product to grocery stores, restaurants, or other wholesale distribution.

Everyone using an incubator kitchen must consider how they will keep their ingredients, packaging, and finished products separate from other operators’ materials. Some incubator kitchens offer locked dry storage and refrigerated storage spaces for each operator. Shared equipment must be cleaned and sanitized before and after use to prevent contaminating others’ products.

It is important to make sure that an incubator kitchen has adequate space and equipment and is suitably constructed for a given product and process. For example, an incubator kitchen that is appropriate for a dry spice mix producer may not work for a canning operation.

The Kansas Department of Agriculture is happy to assist businesses in assessing whether an incubator kitchen is a good fit for their operations.
